WORKSHOP CONFRONTS AND CONFOUNDS

The CURE-UC Extension workshop demonstrated that more and more people in the white-Anglo community want to become meaningfully and actively involved in reducing the problems of racism. It demonstrated that the minorities want to work with us toward solutions. This is encourgaging.

However, the workshop also emphasized what we already knew, but sometimes forget. The complex problems of racism have generated deep and bitter feelings of genuine hurt and anger which rise up to frustrate even the most patient and well-intentioned of us - black, brown or white.

We were confronted with this problem again in the workshop. In addition, there was a wide range of understanding and commitment among the participants which further complicated the situation. Consequently, the workshop was not as obviously productive as planned, and many went away perhaps even more frustrated.

Nevertheless, there was real progress. More people did become actively involved. A sincere desire and concern was witnessed. And hopefully the shortcomings which frustrated some, rather than simply discouraging us, had a sobering and tempering effect, deepening and strengthening our commitment to effect change.
