SAN DIEGO VIGNETTE: It was at the end of World War I when a dashing young Army officer dived into the water from a Coronado Yacht Club dock to rescue a drowning three-year-old girl. The papers covered the story briefly and it was forgotten. It was more than 40 years later, in an idle conversation at the Globe Theatre, that two old friends—older in friendship than they knew — realized they had been the Army officer and the child: Delza Martin, a longtime member of the Globe's executive board, and Lowell Davies, the Old Globe president for the past 25 years.
