

SAN DIEGO STATE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY SPECIAL COLLECTIONS NETWORK TELEVISION NEWS VIDEO RESEARCH ARCHIVE

The archive contains MP4 videos of more than 220 local and network television news reports covering a variety of research topic areas, including African-American history, Cold War confrontations, the post-World War II search for Nazi fugitives, Middle East war and peace efforts, urban unrest, science and technology, fine arts, music, journalism, advertising, public relations, and U.S. government spending. The archive is currently seeking to expand topic areas to include reporting on major U.S. Supreme Court cases, medical and health issues., and rebel groups in Central America and the Middle East. The collected stories, many reported by SDSU alumnus John Martin (Class of 1960) appeared between 1966 and 2002 on ABC News, NBC News, and KCRA News (Sacramento). The collection contains network news obituaries of Leonid Brezhnev, Maria Callas, Henry Fonda, Bob Hope, and Grace Kelly. An obituary of Black Activist George Jackson appeared on KCRA. The videos are available for screening in the SDSU Library Special Collections (Contact: askscua@sdsu.edu or 619-594-6791).

Content: NBC News Today Show February 12, 2004 Segment "Where in the World?" Moscow. Katie Couric in New York, Matt Lauer in Red Square. NBC Producer Carol Grisanti

Lauer describes features of ancient buildings constructed at the orders of Ivan the Terrible and modernized buildings now housing chic Gum Department Store companies for shoppers, including Estee Lauder, Benetton, Levi, and Hugo Boss. "There are a few Russians who have a lot of rubles," Lauer says, "and coming up, we're going to talk about the new Russia, how a few people are doing very well and the fear that others are being left very far behind, Katie." Morning Newscast segment: Massachusetts state lawmakers seek to challenge court ruling approving gay marriage, two U.S. soldiers die in roadside bombing in Iraq, British Airways cancels a flight to Washington, D.C. and to Saudi Arabia citing unnamed security concerns. Tom Brokaw reports Afghanistan seeks to eliminate poppy drug trade, interviews Afghan President Hamid Kharzal in Kabul. 10:06 In a Today Show segment on the beginnings of private Russian wealth, Lauer profiles budding millionaire travel businessman Roman Brussenshiv, who talks of buying an island in the Mediterranean. Lauer interviews Aliona Doletshava, Russian Vogue Magazine's Editor, and asks how has it improved styles among Russian women. "I would say it's changing a lot in the direction of sophistication."

Content: Matt Lauer probes the 2004 attitudes of two highly successful young businesspeople. Tutta Larsen, a television music video music jockey, admits her view of the Soviet Union as "the best country in the world" plummeted when, at age 16,, she watched the Soviet Union collapse. But she sees a better future: "I'm pretty much excited to be a citizen of this country because so much is going on here," Larsen says, "and I'm part of the whole process." Vassily Sidorov, CEO of the country's largest mobile phone company, said "I think there's a growing understanding of the fact that the prosperous part of the economy, the prior part of the economy, can only go so much without spreading the wealth. The mobile (telephone) sector has proven to be one of the examples of a mass market, and once it has become a mass market, I see all the companies going to billions and billions." Tutta Larsen: "It's either black or white, we have nothing in the middle. No middleclass, but on the other hand, it's very creative, and it's very interesting, and intense, and I'm happy to be a part of it." Matt Lauer: "What about the difference between the advance and that move toward a market economy, and yet, the lagging behind of the move toward a more liberal democracy? How much frustration is there over that? Vassily Sidorov: "I think it is difficult to manage this country and continuous manageability whilst being liberal on the economic front. Balancing the two is oftentimes proving to be difficult, a difficult dilemma. Hence, everyone has to expect what is realistic of the reforms of this country. With that being said, we're never satisfied, you know, Russia has advanced so much in the past 10 years, we're not content with it, but it still takes some time. Matt Lauer: "So, look in your crystal ball for me. So many changes have taken place in the last 13 years, you two are a part of the group that's going to be responsible for the changes that go from here. What major changes are still to come? Tutta Larsen: "I think just this gap between wealth, wealthy people and poverty here, it's supposed to get...to vanish..." Vassily Sidorov: "I think people are...people know the way. It's about teaching people to learn independently, to be more proactive, more liberal minded, you know, be on equal terms with the state, on contract members of the state, being proactive, in general, and I think that there's a great belief that, you know, people are advancing towards that."
